No reading information available for this book of poems for children. In general the artwork is okay. The poems though don't do anything for me. I didn't find them particularly noteworthy but it's always interesting to have a different sort of poetry book around. I'd just as soon read children Shel Silverstein's thought provoking productions.

A contented green bug swimming in teacher's coffee on the cover is a great way to get kids to read a book of poems. From the "Good Morning" poem that introduces the school to "The School Bell" that ends the day, new readers read about familiar schoolroom activities in these kid-friendly poems. Bold oversized illustrations, at times personified with eyes, will catch their attention, especially the busy giant ants inside the front and back covers. The rhythm, rhyme and humor are age appropriate for Level 2 readers.

This is a great little book for introducing poetry throughout the curriculum. I especially like the illustrations. This is a level 2 book for grades 1st-3rd. My classroom has a bug theme, and this book helps me to reinforce the theme in several subject areas. My favorites are Ten Ants in a Classroom and Flying Around the Classroom. I also use the book with my ESE and ELL students as a motivational tool.

I personally did not care for the poems in this book. I thought some were goofy and nothing that would have children want to read again. More for babies to look at the pictures than school children.
