First, concerning the more superficial element, by which I mean the aesthetics, the BHS-RE is slightly larger and thus a bit bulkier than the RHB. BHS-RE clocks in at 1,765 pages, whereas the RHB comes in slightly lower at 1,652. While some may think this difference amounts to significant size difference, it's actually a negligible amount. Once you're dealing with a book whose page number enters four-digit territory, 113 pages really isn't that much. No matter which you choose, they're both big and bulky. The RHB is a duotone and has held up well over the years. The BHS-RE is hardcover (though it's also available in black flexisoft) and time will tell whether or not it is durable. My impression thus far is that it should be able to withstand ordinary use for many years. Other aesthetic elements of note in this volume are the font and the paper. The font, which looks a lot like (and may be) SBL Hebrew, is preferable to the RHB's Hebraica font. This is a matter of personal preference and every reader will have their own preference. For me, this font looks better on the page. Speaking of the page, the paper used in the BHS-RE is not the typical paper used in bibles. It's a more of a sepia tone and is thicker, thus it prevents ghosting more so than the RHB. The BHS-RE's particular paper/font combo is much easier on my eye than that of the RHB and is one of the reasons I prefer it over the RHB. Now, on to the more important elements—the text and features. The text, like the RHB, is the complete text of the BHS and has been checked against the Leningrad Codex (which will differ slightly from the text of the RHB).
